Scrutinize private equity's involvement in health care

*Boston Globe

January 17, 2024

By The Editorial Board

Higher prices, worse outcomes don't serve patients or providers. When Pamela Daly got new wheelchair brakes, they rattled and didn't work. She complained to the manufacturer but after a month was still waiting for replacements. Daly, a disability rights advocate, was late to an event at the State House because the chair slipped while she was getting into it and she fell to the floor and had to call paramedics. Daly's brake problem is among a litany of complaints wheelchair users have made about shoddy fixes and lengthy waits for repairs by the two companies that control a majority of the wheelchair market — Numotion and National Seating and Mobility.

A bill passed by the state Senate earlier this month would require companies to diagnose problems within days and provide a loaner chair while repairs are ongoing. A wheelchair industry trade group backs a competing bill that would address insurance barriers and reimbursement.

In addition to these important issues affecting wheelchair users, which lawmakers should resolve, the problem points to a larger issue affecting many aspects of health care: the growing involvement of private equity.

Private equity is a form of investment where investors buy a stake in a company with the goal of increasing its value then selling it. In a typical transaction, a private equity firm takes money from investors (like pension funds) and combines it with money borrowed from a bank to buy a health care provider. It sells the provider after three to seven years. The private equity firm takes management fees and profits when the provider is sold.

Private equity is not necessarily a bad form of ownership. It is often used to make companies more efficient. But it creates pressure to obtain short-term returns, and the strategies that pull profits from health care companies may not serve patients.

For example, in the wheelchair market, reporting by Mother Jones and the financial watchdog Private Equity Stakeholder Project found that private equity-owned Numotion and National Seating and Mobility bought out their competitors, then won Medicare contracts by offering low prices. That led to less competition and also a need to keep costs low, whether by using lower-quality parts or hiring fewer repair technicians. (The companies acknowledge service challenges but blame factors like insurance requirements and labor shortages.) Medical equipment is only one health care segment eyed by private equity. The Massachusetts Health Policy Commission released data in December that show that of 158 transactions involving health care providers between 2013 and 2022, 71 involved private equity firms, 29 of which occurred in 2021 or 2022. The majority of private equity transactions involved home health and hospice, behavioral health, and dental offices.

Eileen O'Grady, research and campaign director at the Private Equity Stakeholder Project, said private equity gravitates toward fields that are fragmented, where firms can buy up competitors. Home health and behavioral health are also growing markets, with an aging population and regulatory changes that provide more insurance coverage for mental health and substance use treatment. While there is less data available from these industries, studies of private equity investment in hospitals and physician practices suggest it is correlated with higher prices and lower quality.

A study published in JAMA in December found that private equity acquisition of hospitals was associated with a 25 percent increase in hospital-acquired conditions, like falls and infections. Dr. Zirui Song, associate professor of health care policy and medicine at Harvard Medical School, presented data to the Health Policy Commission showing that hospitals acquired by private equity charged more than other hospitals and saw their income rise by an average of $2.3 million annually. They also had higher rates of complications and mortality.

Physician practices acquired by private equity increased prices by 11 percent on average, Song said. Nursing homes acquired by private equity had higher rates of mortality, hospitalizations, and emergency department visits.

Song said one reason for worse outcomes may be that to cut costs, providers often cut staff and replace physicians with lower-cost nurses or physician assistants, while increasing patient volume. Private equity investors also use financial strategies that load providers with debt, which pressures them to find cash quickly. That incentivizes cost-cutting measures like layoffs rather than measures to slowly grow a practice.

There have been high-profile financial problems at several private equity-owned hospitals, like the 2019 bankruptcy and closure of Philadelphia's Hahnemann University Hospital. In Rhode Island, the attorney general sued private equity firm Prospect Medical Holdings last year for violating conditions imposed on the firm when it acquired two hospitals, including owing millions of dollars to vendors. Prospect Medical Holdings left three Connecticut hospitals in dire financial straits and made severe operational cuts, according to the Connecticut Mirror news outlet, and a potential buyer of the hospitals is now seeking state money for the purchase. In Massachusetts, private equity-owned Wellpath, which provides prison health care, is being scrutinized for alleged poor care and inadequate staffing. With the growing ubiquity of private equity, a vital first step is for the Legislature to give the Massachusetts Health Policy Commission authority, which the agency has asked for, to collect data on and scrutinize private equity transactions. Currently, state law requires health care providers to notify the commission when they merge with or are acquired by a hospital, insurer, or other provider if the transaction meets certain revenue thresholds. Expanding the law to require notification of transactions involving for-profit, non-health care entities, with a low revenue threshold, would increase transparency. It would also provide oversight, since the commission can conduct in-depth investigations on market impacts or refer transactions to the attorney general for scrutiny. Having that data will let lawmakers consider whether additional policy steps are warranted. For example, a Massachusetts law prohibiting the "corporate practice of medicine" likely needs modernizing to reflect business arrangements that developed after the law was written. Lawmakers could consider regulating the terms of financial relationships, like limiting the amount of debt that can be used in a health care transaction or imposing financial liability on a private equity firm if a provider declares bankruptcy. It's better to consider common-sense regulations proactively than wait until a local provider is in crisis.

The private equity insurance buying spree dates to the 2008 financial crisis but picked up significantly in recent years. Private Equity's Move Into Insurance Provokes Systemic-Risk Concerns
By Chris Cumming

Private equity's ties to insurers were already criticized for posing risks to policyholders' nest eggs. Now the Treasury and IMF say those investments warrant greater monitoring for possible threats to the financial system. Financial authorities want to know more about whether surging private-equity investment in the insurance sector poses risks to the broader economy. In recent weeks, the Financial Stability Oversight Council—a U.S. Treasury Department panel formed to protect the financial system—and the International Monetary Fund both released reports questioning whether private-equity control of insurance companies makes the financial system less stable. Their comments address a sea change in the insurance business. Over the past decade, alternative asset managers have plunged into the business and now oversee a significant portion of life insurance and annuity assets in the U.S. Linking up with an insurer provides buyout firms a steady stream of assetmanagement fees. . .

Private-equity investment has dramatically changed the life insurance and annuity business over the past decade. By 2022, buyout firms owned 137 U.S. insurance companies with $534 billion in assets, about 6.5% of the entire U.S. market, up from 90 insurers and $314 billion in 2018, around 4.8% of the market, according to NAIC data. For competitive reasons, firms not owned by private equity are under pressure to seek out its investment.

Private Equity's Life Insurance Gambit

The private equity industry tightened its grip on the economy in the wake of the 2008 financial crisis and is now further expanding its reach and influence by buying insurance companies, primarily life insurers and retirement annuity providers. As Institutional Investor reported, private equity firms "have long salivated over insurance company assets as a source of permanent capital. Now that trend has been kicked into high gear."

	Private equity firms use money raised from wealthy individuals and institutional investors like pension funds, university endowments, and sovereign wealth funds to take over and operate companies. Their latest target has been insurance companies. By the second half of 2023, private equity firms' ownership had already grown so significantly that they owned $774 billion in life insurance assets — 9 percent of the life insurance industry — according to the AM Best insurance analyst. Private equity firms are estimated to manage $5.7 trillion in global assets, giving these firms ample ability to buy up even more insurance (2 and other) companies.

Age makes the miracles easier to see

By Anne Lamott

I spend a lot of time looking out the window. Age has given me this time and intention. I didn't have so much of either when I was younger. My brain went much faster. There was so much to do, so much need and striving, and I had my trusty clipboard. Now I study the coral-colored abutilon buds right outside our window, little cups that hold the rainwater. Hummingbirds swing by all day to drink, and so it is a treat both for the eyes and for the spirit, for the bird and for the flower.

One of the blessings of age is that most of us get along with ourselves better than when we were young. . .

One of the hardest aspects of getting old is that time races by like a slot car. I guess everything speeds up when it's going downhill but still, it's unnerving.

Brands find a new way to reach many consumers: Older women

By Britt Peterson

More older women are social media influencers, and young people love them While the advertising industry remains fixated on the 18-to-35 age group as a prime target, over-50 influencers like [61-year-old Stephanie] Glover have recently garnered thousands and sometimes more than 1 million followers, both within their demographic and far beyond. And brands are beginning to take notice, with more and more companies reaching out to older influencers to form lucrative partnerships. "The content [from older female influencers] is doing really well," said James Nord, CEO of Fohr, an influencer marketing company. "Not only is the engagement strong, but they're buying."

And yet, many older influencers still say brands are experiencing growing pains when it comes to working with them. Glover, who views herself as a fashion and lifestyle influencer, is often pigeonholed by brands hoping she'll sell "anti-aging" skin care or medicine, just because of her age. "It just mirrors what society thinks about women and aging, and women of color," she added. . . Older female consumers also represent a valuable, untapped and rapidly expanding market. (Globally, the number of over-50 women is expected to grow by 70 percent by 2050, according to AARP.) Many female boomers and Gen Xers have independent incomes, having attained higher levels of education than past generations and worked all their lives. Although older women, particularly older women of color, were hit hard by the pandemic, they have also rebounded well, and 1 out of 10 U.S. workers is a woman 55 or older.

Hearing aids may boost longevity, study finds. But only if used regularly

By Allison Aubrey

Among the roughly 40 million adults in the U.S. who have hearing loss, most don't use hearing aids. This means they may be missing out on more than just good hearing.

The Dignity Digest Issue # 170 Page 13 January 18, 2024 www.DignityAllianceMA.org

Research shows hearing loss, if left untreated, can increase the risk of frailty, falls, social isolation, depression and cognitive decline. One study from scientists at Johns Hopkins University found that even people with mild hearing loss doubled their risk of dementia.

Now a new study finds that restoring hearing loss with hearing aids may lengthen people's lives.

Dr. Janet Choi, an otolaryngologist with Keck Medicine of USC, wanted to evaluate whether restoring hearing with hearing aids may increase the chances of living longer. . .

Prior research has shown that age-related hearing loss – if untreated – can take its toll on physical and mental health. And a recent study found restoring hearing with hearing aids may slow cognitive decline among people at high risk.

5 U.S. Facts and Trends in 2023 That You Should Know

By Diana Elliott, Vice President for U.S. Programs

The United States is aging rapidly, and recent data underscore this point. The number of births continued to decline. Meanwhile, the median age reached 38.9 years, or about half of the U.S. life expectancy (77.5 years). Framed another way, it's as if the United States entered middle age in 2023. For better or worse, we may be experiencing some of the angst that accompanies such a transition.

Here we highlight five trends that PRB presented in 2023 that offer glimpses into how we are aging as a country and what the future holds for young and older generations alike.

- By 2038, the United States could have more deaths than births. Newly released population projections from the U.S. Census Bureau suggest that by 2038, the nation's deaths will outnumber births. As Beth Jarosz writes, by 2100, we will have more adults ages 65 and older, while children will become a smaller share of the population (at just 16%).
- Aging is exacerbating our caregiver crisis.

As the U.S. population ages, the need for caregiving investments becomes more urgent. In 2021, just 0.7% of the U.S. GDP went toward family investments, well below the average among our peer countries. Such under-investments put pressure on informal caregivers to fill the gap as Americans age. In an era of low unemployment and a shrinking pool of workers, paid caregiving jobs will be hard to fill.

American young women are less safe.

As Sara Srygley and others write in "Losing More Ground," the generational progress of Millennial women declined because of threats to their health and safety. Maternal mortality, homicide, and suicide increased, outweighing gains realized in education, income, and political representation. In particular, Black women have seen a dramatic increase in maternal mortality—a preventable outcome where the United States is failing.

Children and families have lost important supports.

The next generation of parents and workers are today's children. Pandemic-era subsidies to child care providers prevented dramatic declines in the already scarce availability of licensed care. Safety net provisions reduced child poverty in California and the United States overall during the COVID-19 pandemic. With these investments ending,

l acinties	https://tinyurl.com/SpeciialFocusFacilityProgram
	Updated March 29, 2023
	CMS has published a new list of Special Focus Facilities (SFF). SFFs are nursing homes with serious quality issues based on a calculation of deficiencies cited during inspections and the scope and severity level of those citations. CMS publicly discloses the names of the facilities chosen to participate in this program and candidate nursing homes.
	To be considered for the SFF program, a facility must have a history (at least 3 years) of serious quality issues. These nursing facilities generally have more deficiencies than the average facility, and more serious problems such as harm or injury to residents. Special Focus Facilities have more frequent surveys and are subject to progressive enforcement until it either graduates from the program or is terminated from Medicare and/or Medicaid.
	This is important information for consumers – particularly as they consider a

What can advocates do with this information?

- Include the list of facilities in your area/state when providing information to consumers who are looking for a nursing home. Include an explanation of the SFF program and the candidate list.
- Post the list on your program's/organization's website (along with the explanation noted above).
- Encourage current residents and families to check the list to see if their facility is included.
- Urge residents and families in a candidate facility to ask the administrator what is being done to improve care.
- Suggest that resident and family councils invite the administrator to a council meeting to talk about what the facility is doing to improve care, ask for ongoing updates, and share any council concerns.
- For long-term care ombudsmen representatives: Meet with the administrator to discuss what the facility is doing to address problems and share any resources that might be helpful.

Data updated November 2022

This app uses data from the U.S. Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. Fines are listed for the past three years if a home has made partial or full payment (fines under appeal are not included). Information on deficiencies comes from a home's last three inspection cycles, or roughly three years in total. The number of COVID-19 cases is since May 8, 2020, when homes were required to begin reporting this information to the federal government (some homes may have included data on earlier cases).

	Nursing Home Compare Website
	Beginning January 26, 2022, the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services
	(CMS) is posting new information that will help consumers have a better understanding of certain staffing information and concerns at facilities.
	This information will be posted for each facility and includes:
	Staff turnover: The percentage of nursing staff as well as the number of administrators who have stopped working at a nursing home over the past 12-month period.
	Weekend staff: The level of weekend staffing for nurses and registered nurses at a nursing home over a three-month period.
	Posting this information was required as part of the Affordable Care Act, which was passed in 2010. In many facilities, staffing is lower on weekends, often meaning residents have to wait longer or may not receive all the care they need.
	High turnover means that staff are less likely to know the residents, recognize changes in condition, or implement preferred methods of providing care. All of this contributes to the quality-of-care residents receive and their quality of life.
